The extracellular fluid (ECF) serves as a transport medium for nutrients and metabolites within and between organs. Fluid dynamics is a key component of computer modeling of blood flow and it is known that the microvasculature is heterogeneous. To accurately model flows, a detailed representation of the vascular bed is needed. We are developing a software to create digital models of vascular beds that are accurate, adaptable to the needs of the modeling, and computationally efficient. The aim is to provide a quantitative tool for the quantitative study of fluid dynamics and flow patterns in order to understand some of the fundamental aspects of the physiology and pathophysiology of the circulation. To create this tool, we need to develop algorithms to model vessels and the microvessels. We have started to model the microvessels using the PDMS model and as a first step, created an algorithm that can model the hierarchy of arterioles, capillaries, and venules. The models of microvessels provide new insights into the design and analysis of our blood vessel casting experiments. These casts are valuable model systems to reproduce large-scale flow patterns. We are also performing a variety of simulations to understand how these casts might appear to living organisms, and to shed light on the complex systems of blood transport and mixing.The important event in China is the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO).
